The following is a portion of the transcript of an investor conference call, dated as of May 5, 2016, by Cousins Properties Incorporated:

OPERATOR: Our next question comes from Michael Lewis with Centrist.

MR. MICHAEL LEWIS: All right. Thank you. So in 2013 you bought into Houston and rightly said if it's a cyclical market that you think outperforms over time, you positioned the portfolio defensively ahead of the downturn, I think you would probably agree it's performing quite well considering what's going on in the broader market, and now you've been announced you're spinning it. So my question is, if you could hop in a time machine and go back to 2013, do you still invest in Houston, and is there anything you learned or anything you think you might have done differently there?

Larry Gellerstedt: Well, Michael, that's a great question and every now and then in this business you wish you could go back, but we were talking about that the other day. I think when we had the opportunity to buy into Houston it was a huge positive step for our company to establish ourselves in a rapidly growing market of size and scale and be able to get in there and inherit a team, which is a tremendous team. And if you look at the results that team generated both while Houston was still going strong and in my opinion, more importantly, Houston started cooling off with us getting ahead of those big leases, they just did a tremendous job. It was interesting to me a real sort of light came off at the end of the tunnel for me about six or nine months ago and I can't remember what conference it was at, but I started each meeting, each individual meeting with the investors and said is there anything I could say to you in this investor meeting about Houston that's going to change your mind about Houston, and they said, no. And so I think what then happened was you looked at the size and scale of what you had in Houston mixed together with your other assets and you realize that you needed an opportunity to let more visibility come in to the Houston portfolio without the distraction of the other cities, because it really wasn't nearly as bad as people were thinking it was, and that was a key element of our conversations with Parkway is they had a similar situation and by putting a ring fence around those assets we now have a tremendous group of assets in Houston, which we think will outperform the downside and the upside where the management team 100% dedicated to that. And I think that will appeal to a certain type of investors. So I think that the logic by which we made the decision was good. I think the way in which we executed while we had the assets was good, and I think the way in which we're now pooling the assets together is just fantastic and I couldn't have more confidence in Jim and the Parkway team to work with our collective teams in Houston and get a tremendous amount of value out of those assets to the shareholders. I'm equally glad that the shareholders of the new Cousins are benefiting from these collective assets and both companies that largely overlapped. I mean that was one of the amazing things about Parkway and Cousins not just in cities, but also in terms of quality, urban best sub markets and put that in its own company that can stand on its own and really distinguish itself and these other markets. So that's what I was trying to get across in my excitement and my opening remarks.

MR. LEWIS: Thank you. My second question is about the rest of the geography, so I don't know if it's too early to ask you how you feel about Orlando, Tempe, Tampa, markets that you weren't previously in or ask you about how you think you're going to be a premiere sunbelt - how many sunbelt markets do you think that includes and are there some others where you see opportunity?

Larry: Yeah, Michael, I think it's early for that. I think as you see our further information come out in terms of as we get towards '17 and start showing some numbers on where we think '17 is and we've had further time to get through the transaction part and look at the asset part, but you'll see more of that, but at a fairly low level, if you look at these three cities that are new to us, they meet our criteria.

Cautionary Note Regarding Forward-Looking Statements
